

Maranello, 20th April 2015

My dear friends,

I feel obliged to open this message with my congratulations to Kimi. He drove a fantastic race and achieved success not just passing Rosberg in the final lap (a big source of satisfaction this was) but during his middle stint, when he was flying on prime tyres until we started to think that those were faster than the 'option' rubber. This is the first time he visits the podium since he came back 'home', and he did it in style, so bravo Iceman!

As for Sebastian, I would have bet on another sensational result with him, but conditions outside were not the same as Friday, during race simulations, and we certainly did not see the best of him today.

Just one year ago, the outcome of this race triggered a number of revolutions which I am not going to recall now.

Today, we managed to put such a pressure on the Mercedes that Rosberg was struggling with his brakes towards the end.

I don't know how many other teams – or companies – could be capable of such a reaction, but this is not the right moment for complacency. We still have a gap to close and it's quite a relevant one, notably in qualifying. Instead, we must push with renovated strength and enthusiasm, being sure that we have taken the right direction and can always count on our special tifosi, who never let us down in dire straits and now deserve to relish great results as we do.

Forza Ferrari, Forza Jules!
