Dear Friends,

Felipe is fine: that's definitely the most important piece of news after such a difficult and troubled weekend.

Crashing into the barriers at the same point and almost in the same way in the space of two days is a terrible thing to happen to anyone. That's why right from the start I'm keen to underline that positive news about Felipe's condition.

As has been said before, qualifying, which at Monaco has the greatest influence on the outcome of the race, did not see us up there with the best. Honestly neither did the race go as we could have hoped for and we will definitely have to embark on a thorough analysis of the reasons for this.

It's true that some tracks show specific characteristics of our car in a bad light, while others seem to make them shine.

As I always say, we don't need to go overboard when we win, nor should we get downhearted when we lose.

I repeat, this is going to be a long season and not just for us.
Therefore it's a case of full speed ahead and....Forza Ferrari!
